

INWARD

A COMPASS FOR THE ATTENTION AGE

An app for everyone who is tired of being farmed for attention — and ready to put spirit over matter.

WHY · THIS · EXISTS

The most valuable thing you own is being taken from you

Not your money. Your attention — which is to say, your life.

The most sophisticated machine ever built is currently pointed at your mind. Feeds, shorts, pornography, loot boxes, autoplay — these are not entertainment products. They are extraction systems, engineered by thousands of brilliant people whose job is to keep you scrolling, because every minute of your awareness is sold to someone else. This is not a metaphor. It is the business model.

And here is the part nobody says aloud: it works because we are empty. A culture that believes only matter exists has nothing left to value but more — more growth, more speed, more stimulation, more consumption. The endless scroll is simply materialism made into a habit, performed billions of times a day. We are not weak. We are starved, and we are being fed sugar.

Everyone already feels it. Nobody finishes three hours of scrolling feeling nourished. The emptiness after the binge is the most universal spiritual experience of our time — felt by believers and atheists alike, in every country, every night. That ache is not a malfunction. It is a compass needle, and it is pointing away from the screen.

Inward is built on one conviction: the call to slow down is only rational if there is something other than matter worth attending to. There is. Most traditions have called it the soul. You do not need to be religious to feel its hunger — only honest.

“We are not selling slowness. We are selling the feeling of being alive — the one thing the feed can never deliver, and everyone knows it.”

What Inward is — and is not

Inward is a compass, not a casino. It is a daily practice of reorientation: away from power, money, and stimulation; toward love, depth, and presence. It is for anyone with a functional heart — Christian, Muslim, Jewish, Hindu, Buddhist, Indigenous, agnostic, or simply restless. It borrows the wisdom of every tradition and the dogma of none. And it is designed to be the only app on your phone that wants to see you less.

DESIGN · PHILOSOPHY

An app against acceleration must refuse to accelerate you

Five principles, each the exact inversion of the attention economy.

-
- 01 No feed, no infinity
Nothing in Inward scrolls forever. Every screen ends. One reading, one question, one practice — then the app tells you: now go live it. Completion replaces consumption.
-
- 02 Dopamine is the enemy's weapon, courage is ours
No streaks engineered for anxiety, no variable rewards, no red badges. The only “hit” Inward offers is the real one: the feeling after doing something slightly brave in the real world.
-
- 03 Shame is banned
Compulsion is not a character verdict — these systems were built by experts to hook you. Inward never scolds. It interrupts the spiral with kindness and one honest question: what are you actually hungry for?
-
- 04 Beauty is an argument
The feed is loud, cheap, and ugly. Inward is the most beautiful thing on your phone: silence, space, typography, awe. People do not reason their way back to the soul — they glimpse it.
-
- 05 Success means needing it less
Ad-free. No data sold, ever. No engagement targets. The metric that matters is reverse retention: how many users, after a year, spend less time on all screens — including this one.
-

CORE · FEATURES

Seven instruments of one compass

Every feature answers the same question from a different angle: what is your life actually pointed at?

DAILY · ORIENTATION · — · 60 · SECONDS

O1 The Compass

One quiet question each morning: “What will you give your attention to today?” One reflection each night: did today move toward spirit — presence, love, depth — or toward matter — speed, accumulation, distraction? Over weeks you watch your own needle slowly turn. No scores, no streaks. A direction, not a grade.

FOR · THE · MOMENT · THE · URGE · HITS

O2 The Craving Button

One tap when the pull toward the feed, the game, or porn arrives. Ninety seconds of guided breathing, then one question: what are you actually hungry for? Usually the answer is connection, rest, or meaning — so Inward suggests one real action: message a friend, step outside, drink water, sit still. The urge is not defeated; it is decoded.

COURAGE · AS · THE · NEW · GRIND

O3 Dares, Not Streaks

Escalating real-world challenges you choose: one meal with no screen. One walk with no headphones. One day without buying anything non-essential. One true sentence said to one real person. Each dare is concrete, finishable today, and slightly scary. Gamers don’t lack discipline — they lack a worthy game. The inner life is the hardest one there is.

WHAT · YOU · WORSHIPPED · THIS · WEEK

O4 The Attention Ledger

With your permission, Inward shows where your hours and money actually flowed — framed not as productivity analytics but as a spiritual ledger. This is what you treated as ultimate, in practice. Quietly devastating, and more persuasive than any sermon. Your data never leaves your device.

CORE · FEATURES, · CONTINUED

THE · ANTI-FEED

05 One Deep Thing

One reading per day, never two: Heschel today, Rumi tomorrow, then Dostoevsky, Black Elk, the Tao, the Gospels, the suttas — deliberately cross-traditional. No swiping to the next. When it ends, the screen goes dark and says: now go live it.

REST · AS · REBELLION

06 The Sabbath Switch

Design and protect one recurring period of deliberate rest — no commerce, no scrolling, no productivity. During it, Inward itself goes dark except for a single contemplative line. Rest is the oldest refusal to let matter rule us; every tradition kept it. We give it back to everyone.

COMMUNITY · WITHOUT · CROWD

07 Circles

Five to eight people who share one weekly reflection and take on dares together. No likes, no followers, no performance — no audience at all. Societies do not change through viral content; they change through small groups of people quietly living differently, and being noticed.

The first sixty seconds

Asking a scroller to meditate for ten minutes is asking a non-runner to run a marathon. So the entry bar sits near zero: the first thing Inward ever asks of you is one breath. Then one sentence against a black screen. Then one question. The bar to “I did something real today” must be lower than the bar to opening the feed — depth is built later; the first win is instant.

REACHING · PEOPLE · WHERE · THEY · ARE

You cannot out-TikTok TikTok — and we won't try

The strategy is not to make slowness exciting. It is to meet people inside their restlessness, at the exact moment it turns to disgust.

Heavy scrollers do not need convincing that something is wrong — they feel the emptiness every night. The desire for depth is already there, buried under habit and shame. Inward's job is to be the exit ramp that doesn't feel like homework or church.

WHERE THE FEED PULLS	WHERE INWARD POINTS
Infinite scroll	Every screen ends
Stimulation	Awe
Streaks and anxiety	Dares and courage
Shame after the binge	One kind question
Audience and performance	A circle of eight, no likes
You are the product	You are the point
More, faster, emptier	Enough, slower, alive

Enter through their channels

First contact happens inside the feeds themselves: short, arresting, cinematic clips — “When did you last feel actually alive?” over forty seconds of beauty, ending in silence. The attention economy’s own channels carry the seed of leaving it.

Defiance, not retreat

Nobody wants to be a sheep — and right now, the scroller is the sheep, farmed for attention by trillion-dollar systems. Inward gives restraint the rebel energy it has always deserved: visible self-command in a culture of engineered compulsion. They monetize your weakness; you opted out. Monks were the spiritual athletes of every tradition. We recover that.

Lives as the advertisement

Inward will not convert the world from an app store. It serves the millions already searching for the exit; they change visibly — calmer, freer, harder to manipulate — and the people around them ask why. Every movement that ever mattered spread exactly this way: not by argument, but by contagious aliveness.

THE · HONEST · PAGE

Answering our sharpest critic before they speak

A compass that ignores its hardest objections is just another product. Here are ours, faced head-on.

“A wellbeing app is itself a product of the system it critiques.”

True — and the answer is structural, not rhetorical. Inward is free or near-free, carries no ads, sells no data, and publishes a reverse-retention report: proof that long-term users spend less total time on screens. An app whose success is measured by your absence is the only credible answer.

“This is religion smuggled into software.”

Inward asserts no doctrine. It makes one wager any honest materialist can entertain: that consciousness, love, and moral weight are not reducible to chemistry — and that a life lived as if they matter is measurably less empty. Every tradition is quoted; none is enforced. The atheist who simply wants their evenings back is fully at home here.

“Slowing down is a luxury of the comfortable.”

The attention economy preys hardest on the poor, the lonely, and the young — they are the most farmed. Reclaiming attention is not a lifestyle upgrade for the privileged; it is the cheapest liberation there is. That is why Inward must never be priced like a luxury.

“Technology also relieves immense suffering.”

It does, and Inward is technology. The enemy is not the tool but the business model that converts human weakness into revenue. We are proof that the same materials can be shaped into an instrument instead of a trap.

The covenant

No advertising, ever. No sale or sharing of personal data, ever. No engagement-maximizing design, ever. All reflection data stays on your device. Inward’s code of persuasion is published openly, so anyone can verify that the compass has no hidden magnet.

You were not made to be harvested.

You were made to be alive.

Inward will never sell your attention, your data, or your loneliness.
Its only measure of success is the day you need it less — because your life has grown bigger than your screen.

SPIRIT OVER MATTER — THE SOUL LEADS, THE WORLD SLOWS